The issue of English in this personality test might be a challenge to those who have other languages as home languages. As I was going through answering the questions, in some one had languages as nome langauges. AS I was going through answering the questions, in some one had to go find the meaning of words before I could answer. Me wonder how many people that have been tested, whom are not English speaking people, who just answer for the sake of continuity without understanding the question?

I think there is something to be said for people who are not overtly social. I will meet up with my buds a few times a month and a couple of us are near by each thers and we can be indoors talking from 6pm at night till 6am are one of the local coffee joints. I think we often overvalue the need to be social and under value those who enjoy both solitude and being social.

Rather negative if you not high in your test... Isn't OK to be non-structural, as an example /don't get me started on the others). I think MBTI / JTI is more positive

Like · Reply · 4 · 1y

Devon Cook

Positive and negative are irrelevant, the big five is more accurate while MBTI has been derided as worthless by psychologists for decades.

The conscientiousness is way too low; I get my work done on time and well. I just don't put my things away! I'm in a PhD program, and have to prioritize my time, mental effort. and physical energy. Also, I've recently had three deaths in the family (both parents and my Godfather), which have affected my mood. Your questionnaire does not consider life contingencies. Perhaps your N will be large enough to balance them out, but as an individual gauge, this is inaccurate.

Another comment: The label of "Intellect/Imagination" applied to "Openness to Experience" is inaccurate. I know several people who have what would be classified as intellectual disabilities (such as Down Syndrome) who are very much open to new experiences. I know any number of people who are conservative and traditional who are also highly intelligent AND open to new experiences, and people who are neither conservative nor traditional, but are incredibly close-minded (anyone who doesn't see things their way/go along with their ideas is not worth their time), or have intellectual challenges.

To me, these examples indicate that Intellect/Imagination is not the same construct as Openness to Experience: one is about mental capability; the other is about a sense of curiosity and/or adventure.

Like · Reply · 13 · 1y

Lacey J Thiessen

you seem to be taking a very individual, anecdotal approach to this. That's not the purpose of this test. Openness and Intelligence are the two most highly correlated personality traits. I don't what that say about your personal experiences, but these tests are very broad. Large sample sizes. Your experiences are a drop in the bucket.

Like · Reply · 11 · 1y

Angellica Martinez Zhilsova

I think the big five correlate somewhat to the MBTI tests (Factor 1 - Introversion/Extroversion, Factor 2 - Assertive/Turbulent, Factor 3 - Feeling/Thinking, Factor 4 - Judging/Perceiving, Factor 5 - Sensing/Intuitive). MBTI data does show that the personality types with the highest MBTI score did tend to be iNtuitive types (or in this case very open to experience, higher 5 factor score), especially introverted intuitives.

Conservative/traditional people that are open to new experiences, and non-conservative closed minded people are both likely smack down in the middle of the Sensing/iNtuitive, or in this case, Factor 5 ,and likely do not lean one of the other way significantly. They likely balance their more tangible experiences and large pools of over-arching data/possibilities equally, or prefer to base their decisions and thoughts on one over the other depending on the subject.

Discuss the following:

Do you agree or disagree with the results?

Yes.

What was the result that most surprised you?

None were surprizing.

If there is a trait you disagree with, discuss why.

The test is very close to describing me. I think I am very imaginative.

How might these results be useful to you in your interactions with others?

I see ways that I can improve myself. I need to listen more and be more attentive to my surroundings. None of my scores show a real bad weakness. I just need to be more aware of myself.

Like · Reply · 3 · 1y

I disagree on how conscientiousness is measured, for having little care about your own material belongings or the appearance of your room has not so much to do on how impulsive or diligent you are when dealing with other people.

Fred Weigman

Hmmm, you're right. It made you made think for a moment. Maybe looking at what other people do and rating their behavior from one's own perception may actually be more telling about how you think and are in your own behavior. Basically looking at others to see how we relate or do not relate in comparison which in turn can help give a general definition of ourselves. I feel personally I never like being labelled or placed in a categories that still seem to vague. More highly scenario based questions are in order perhaps.

The difficulty here is that while particular attributes may have been estimated accourately, the importance of context is ignored. In what situations is my emotional stability more labile? About what am I conscientious, what careless? The discussion missing is the hierarchy of these characteristiss and the level to which they are generally applicable to me in every day life.

Sasoke Meh

Your personality is the type of traits that are CONSTANT across different situations and times, which means, for example, if someone was emotionally instable they will tend to be instable across different situations. Therefore, the context is irrelevant to personality measures because they measure CONSTANT traits.

Like · Reply · 1v

Christian Mouritsen

Shounen Meh well if you're surrounded by stressfull people and environment you might have bad emotional score, but if you have a good surrounding envirointment at home, you might score high from that context, can't you really imagine the glitch in such questions/test?

Like · Reply · 3 · 47w

Michael Tolhurst

@shounen.meh Christian Mouritsen The environment we live in has an impact on the way that these constants will be shaped over time, however this is a snapshot of your personality at a single moment in time.

These tests assume that personality stays perfectly constant throughout life, which doesn't seem likely (but I'm not a psychologist so just speculating).
